National Severe Weather Warning Service

Chief Forecasters Assessment
Further bands of showers running into southern counties and across the southeast of England, have the potential to produce intense bursts of rain, these quickly leading to localised impacts given the very saturated ground. Hail will be an additional hazard associated with some of the heaviest showers. It won't be raining all the time, with some drier interludes likely but on the other hand, longer spells of rain may occur, more particularly in the southeast overnight into Tuesday and again, perhaps more widely, overnight into Wednesday. 15 to 25 mm may fall in around 6 hours at any time through this period, with overall 36-hour totals perhaps exceeding 40 mm at a few localities.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 18:00 on Mon, 06th Jan 2014 until 06:00 on Wed, 08th Jan 2014

Heavy showers, some of them combined with hail and thunder, will continue to affect parts of southern and southeastern England at times through the rest of Monday, Tuesday and early Wednesday: the warning has been extended into the first hours of Wednesday to cater for the increased likelihood of a further spell of rain in similar areas.

The public should be aware of the risk of further localised flooding, especially in areas which have been affected in recent days.
